She's starred in "Chicago," but New York is Rumer Willis' kind of town. Though the "Dancing With the Stars" contestant's based in LA, she has fond memories of the Upper West Side apartment her parents Bruce Willis and Demi Moore kept near Central Park, and her sister Scout's digs on the Lower East Side. On the eve of her Café Carlyle debut (April 5 to 9), she tells The Post how she spends her New York City downtime.

I love just walking around the city, especially Washington Square Park. Two years ago I was shooting a pilot there, "Songbyrd." I love the park when it's filled with people playing music.

I'm also a huge french-fry connoisseur, and when I was doing "Chicago," I'd always get food from Poulette. It's almost like fast-food chicken, only they have rotisserie, which is healthier. I always feel that french fries are an acceptable food. I'm also a huge fan of Café Habana for lunch. It's on Prince and Elizabeth, and they have the most amazing fried plantains. There's a square of shops right there, [including] one of my favorite perfume shops, Le Labo. My sister Scout found it. There's this scent she wore from there — I can't remember what it's called, but whenever I smell anyone wearing it, it reminds me of her. I finally went in and got myself a bottle of it.

One of my favorite places to get tacos is Tacombi. It's a little hole in the wall — it's [got] this mini RV or van, and it kind of transports you to another world. They have great grilled-fish tacos and amazing sangria.

Right next to Tacombi is Love Adorned, which has an amazing collection of new jewelry and incredible vintage pieces. It's just one of those cool shops that's curated very well and is kind of funky, with everything from candles to cashmere scarves. I bought myself a beautiful vintage pinkie ring there that looks like a signet ring.

When my sisters and I lived in New York, we'd go to brunch on Sundays at this little diner on the Lower East Side called Dimes, then find a little place around Chinatown to get a foot rub.
